To the DAILY GAZETTEER.

I R,

THO' I have not read a Craftſman, nor any other political Paper, in ſeveral Months, yet I have had Parts of them rehearſed to me by their Admirers, and could not help making a few Remarks on ſome extraordinary Things that have come from Mr. D'Anvers and his Fellow-mourers. Caleb, who has diſtinguiſhed himſelf by moſt impudent and ſcurrilous Scandals that ever e publiſhed againſt Perſons of the higheſt Dignity Merit, is writing very accurate Diſſertations in ence of Raillery; which, like others of the gar, he miſtakes for Railing, tho' 'tis no more to it, than Tickling is to Pinching. His Fellow-ourers ſeem to know as little of Raillery as him-; and, indeed, there is one thing abſolutely ne-ary to the Knowledge of it, which none of them e us the leaſt Shadow of in their Writings, and is WIT; Raillery being nothing elſe but Wit, oily and delicately turn'd and expreſs'd. The ject has been hitherto treated by them, without much as naming the Word Wit, as if it had no e Relation to the Thing, than to their Perſons. he Craftſman, and ſome late Satyrs, are happily delicately turn'd and expreſs'd, there's Raillery hem, which is not only juſtifiable, but laudable: hey are Falſe and Defamatory, they rail, and do rally, and are guilty of Crimes for which the ient Heathens had ſuitable Puniſhments by the s of the XII Tables. The Romans drubb'd, or er baſtinadoed ſuch Libellers, after the Manner the Turks; and they had another ſort of Puniſh-nt for dull and impertinent Writers; which was, make them lick off the Impreſſion of their Works m the Vellum or Paper on which they were tten. Had Mr. D'Anvers lived and written when Law was eſtabliſhed at Rome, and he had had as y Tongues as Argus had Eyes, he would have n them all away by this Licking; for what he calls Raillery, in leſs than a Year, in caſe his Scur-y and Inſolence had not made an End of him and Labours in much leſs time, by the other Law of linado, which no Offender ever got off of by ading Raillery. Caleb muſt know, if he is not ig-ant to a Prodigy, that the Matters he pretends to ert himſelf with in his Horſe Play, were not what Ralliers, who underſtood their Science, and had it to manage it, ever meddled with. Boileau, who a Satyriſt, and a very ſevere one, lays it down, as only Excuſe for ſuch Poems, that they muſt not nd the State nor Conſcience. If Mr. D'Anvers, d a late Satyriſt, have obſerved this Rule, they are iſiable to the Law and to themſelves, and have ended only by their Folly and Vanity: But, if y have been Defamers and falſe Witneſſes to the judice of their Neighbour's good Name, they are compatable to thoſe ſtrict Judges, Conſcience and w. Conſcience is a Court where no Inuendoes ere ever made uſe of, and all Slanderers are firſt demn'd in it, before any other Court takes Cog-ance of them. If that has been, or may be the e of our Ralliers, it was eaſy for them to have rnt what are the proper Subjects for Satyr, and Raillery; ſuch are Avarice, Prodigality, Bigottry, dantry, Hypocriſy, Foppery, Pride, Oſtentation, llantry in Amour, Pretenſion to Learning and it, and, indeed, all kinds of Affectation. Theſe Ralliers in all Ages have taken as lawful Prize, d condemn'd them: Not ſuch Ralliers as Mr. Anvers, who ſo little knows the Meaning of the ord Raillery, that he takes a Skimmington, or a affy on the Firſt of March, to be what the French ll la belle Raillerie, fine Raillery; and, in this enſe, he is vindicating his own Libels. The Ri-culum in Horace, he applies to the deteſtable Buf-onery in them, meaner and more abuſive than the rgon and Effronterie of our Oxford Terræ Filius. e knows whereabouts I am.

BOILEAU, before-mentioned, tho' moderate and odeſt in his Satyrs, compared with the Craftſman's Libels and ſome late Satyrs, gave ſuch Offence to Perſons of Virtue and Honour, that the Duke de Montauſier, Præceptor to the Dauphin, Grandfather to the preſent French King, ſaid of him, Dans un Etat bien police, &c. In a well-govern'd State he would be ſent to the Gallies. On this Occaſion, a French Author refer'd to the Ordinance of Auguſtus, mentioned by Dio, and the Laws of Conſtantine, and other Emperors, inſerted in the Theodoſian Code, by which all ſcandalous Libels were condemn'd to be burnt, and the Libellers to be whipp'd. The Duke de Nevers, as illuſtrious for his Learning and Wit, as for his Birth and Rank, ſaid, of ſuch Ralliers as D'Anvers, and our late Satyriſts, that they ſhould be dealt with as the Laws of the XII Tables directed, Fuſtibus, with Clubs. Now, let any one, ever ſo little acquainted with theſe Matters, whether Proteſtant or Papiſt, Turk or Jew, explain what he underſtands by publice inſebebatur, publickly inveighing in thoſe Laws; and, if it does not, by his Explanation, appear, that D'Anvers, Common Senſe, and a late Satyriſt, are the very Criminals within the Letter of thoſe Laws, I muſt ſubmit to the Guilt and Penalty of them myſelf for abuſing ſo many excellent Perſons, ſo diſtinguiſhed by their Sincerity, Modeſty, Moderation, Genius and Learning.

AUTHORS againſt Authors, and againſt Follies and Vices, except where the latter are enormous, (and ſuch as are guilty of them, rather belong to the Hangman than the Satyriſt) may rally us as ſmartly, and as pleaſantly, as they can, keeping within the Verge of Decency and Truth; but Government loſes its very Nature and Uſe, when 'tis expoſed to the lewd Mirth and Contempt of the Multitude. This is too obvious to be more than juſt mentioned. Horace rally'd beſt of any of the Ancients among the Latins; but he never took the Liberty to turn Perſons of Conſular Dignity into Ridicule: He was too much a Maſter of Reaſon, good Manners, and Diſcretion, to offend againſt either, and much leſs to endeavour, by falſe and profligate Tales and Taints, to diſturb the Peace and good Order of Society. The Mayor of a Country Town, a Pragmatical Blockhead, proud of his Fur-Gown, and inſolent with his paultry Magiſtracy, was one of the higheſt Characters he ſported with.

Fundos Aufidio Luſco, &c.

Aufidius Luſcus, who had been a Juſtice's Clerk, being advanced to be Prætor of Fondi, Sixty or Seventy Miles from Rome, affected the Robe and Air of a Senator and Man of Quality; at which Horace ſays, He and his Fellow-Travellors laugh'd heartily.

—— Inſani Ridentes præmia Scribæ
Prætextum et Latum Clavum, &c.

IF Horace cou'd have given Way to a more Libertine Wit, which was not conſiſtent with the Probity of his Mind and the Extent of his Knowledge, he was himſelf a Courtier and a Favorite, and might have been the Freer with his Fellows; but what wou'd have become of a Scribler, who ply'd for Buſineſs at the Pillars before the Bookſellers Row, much frequented by ſuch Gentry in Old Rome, if he, like Caleb D'Anvers, had bely'd and vilify'd the Principal Miniſters of State. If Lucilius the Satyriſt, made free with Metellus and Lupus, Men of Quality, he was himſelf the ſame, and being on a Par with them as to Rank and Birth, he was intitled to thoſe Liberties in his Speech of them, which a Bond man or a Freed-man wou'd not have been privileg'd in, but have been turn'd over to the Lictors, for the Correction which was injoyn'd by the Laws. There is no Inſtance in any good Author, Antient or Modern, of the Inſolence and Brutality of our pretended Ralliers and Satyriſts, and nothing cou'd be more impertinent than thoſe Laws before ſpoken of, made by the greateſt and wiſeſt Emperors and States, if Slanderers and Buffoons might be permitted to intepret their Buffoonry and Slander, according as it ſerv'd their Turn to avoid the Cenſure and Correction of the Magiſtrates, nothing being more eaſy, than for them to deny their true Meaning, and diſguiſe it with abominable Cant and Vizards, like the middle Comedy of Athens, where ſuch Vizards repreſented the Faces of the Perſons intended to be ridiculed: Which Abuſe of the Stage call'd upon the Magiſtrates to reform it, as they accordingly did, by aboliſhing that barbarous Cuſtom, not yet ſo barbarous as D'Anvers and ſome late Satyriſts, printing not only the Initials and Titles, but the very Names of the moſt Worthy and moſt Noble in infamous Libels and Lampoons, which they vainly pretend to ſhelter under the plauſible Terms of Raillery and Satyr, tho' no more a-kin to either, than to good Nature and good Manners, to Virtue and Humanity. The Greeks were ſo delicate in this Article, that there was no ſuch kind of Poetry among them as Satyr: Una noſtra eſt. This one Poem is our own, ſaid a Roman Critick. The Ignorance of Mr. D'Anvers, &c. as to Raillery, is no manner of Diſadvantage to them; for their Readers are every whit as ignorant as Themſelves, and, to a Man, are of Opinion, that the Dialogues among the Fiſhery are of the Raillery Kind. What are ſuch rare Judges the better for having Examples of it in as great Perfection among the Moderns as are any among the Antients; ſuch as Voiture and Saraſin in French; ſuch as Biſhop Sprat's Anſwer to Scribere; Archbiſhop Tillotſon's Anſwer to Sergeant the Prieſt; Biſhop Burnet's Anſwer to Varillas; Dr. Burnet of the Charterhouſe, his Anſwer to the Rev. Mr. Warren, who made a ſorry Critique upon his Theory, ſuch as Mr. Montague's (afterward Earl of Halifax) Merriment with Dryden's Hind and Panther? The Ridiculum of Horace, mentioned by Caleb D'Anvers, as Parrots ſpeak without knowing what they ſay, gives that Pleaſure which makes one in Love with him that ſays it, without hating the Perſon of whom it is ſaid. One Laughs at the Folly and Vanity, without minding the Perſon's Face or Condition; but the Libels and Satyrs of the preſent polite Times, raiſe Indignation againſt both the Writers and the Subjects of their Writings, when their true Characters are not known.

I ſhall cloſe this dry Diſſertation with ſomething more pleaſant and entertaining, taken from Mr. Walſh's Letters, which are lively Inſtances of fine Raillery; and prove, that Caleb D'Anvers is as much a Stranger to it as to Coptic, or Runic. Mr. Walſh was our Engliſh Voiture, nothing inferior to the French in Delicacy, and according to the Genius of our Nation, ſuperior in Wit. The following Paſſage is addreſſed to a Lady who was going to be marry'd; and he ſays, ſpeaking of the Lovers ſhe was leaving, viz.

'They are about to put an End to their Deſpair, 'after the old Way, on ſome of the Trees in the 'Park. I ſaid, Gentlemen, it is contrary to all 'Precedent, to make uſe either of Elm, or Lime-'trees, ſince the Willow had been, Time out of 'Mind, reſerved for that Uſe; and that a Lover, 'who did not hang himſelf according to Form, had 'as good never hang himſelf at all: They anſwer'd 'me very ſurlily, tho' very truly too. I muſt own, 'that it was no Buſineſs of mine; that it was a hard 'Caſe People might not hang themſelves without 'asking my Leave; and as they would not hinder 'me, was I going about ſuch a thing, they took it 'very ill that I ſhould pretend to hinder them. I 'muſt confeſs, I cou'd ſay very little in the Caſe, 'and you may believe I had no great mind to enter 'upon a Quarrel with People in their Circumſtances.'

I am ſenſible Caleb D'Anvers, and our late Satyriſts, may object, that Mr. Walſh's Subjects was Gallantry, which naturally falls into Raillery; but had he touch'd on Political Matters, he would have rail'd as they do: So probably they may really think, becauſe they are the very Reverſe of his Character; a Man of excellent Learning, Senſe and Judgment; a fine Critick, and fine Gentleman; a Man of Honour and Diſcretion; and, if ſuch handle any Subject, their Character will always be ſeen in it. Mr. Walſh did, in one of his Letters, touch a very ſerious Matter, in which the State was moſtly concerned. In a Letter to another Lady, who had ſaid, A Woman muſt have a Care of having to do with him, becauſe he was a Wit, &c. He reply'd, this is acting after the Manner of ſome late Judges *, to call a Thing Treaſon without Law, and then hang a Man for it without Proof. But this, and every thing elſe reaſonable and commendable, is thrown away on ſuch Libellers and Lampooners as our Modern Railers and Satyriſts, who can no more judge of ſuch Things without Wit, than they can add a Cubit to their Stature, or turn a Curve Line into a Right.
